Read, Study, Review

Aside from an educator and abolitionist, Mary Ann Shadd was also known for being the first Black female newspaper publisher in Canada. She was born in 1823 in Delaware, a then-slave state. It was under this environment that Shadd was inspired by her activist parents, whose house was a station on the Underground Railroad.

In 1851, Shadd established a racially integrated school in Canada, opposing segregation in a public dispute. In addition, she highlighted the benefits of settling in this country in educational booklets. Later in 1853, Shadd published The Provincial Freeman to promote emigration to Canada. The newspaper even featured articles about anti-slavery and women's rights. Despite the paper's termination years later, Shadd's contributions to racial and gender equality have made her a Person of National Historic Significance today.
